A Motor Car Runs into a Transfer Wagon at the Trestle.

(Columbus Evening Dispatch, February 29, 1892, page 6)

A thrilling accident occurred about 8 o'clock this morning at the foot of the north approach to the street railway trestle, a motor car running into one of Osborne's large covered transfer wagons while going at a rapid rate, having gained an impetus while rounding the curve so as to ascend the grade.

On the wagon were two employees of the transfer company, Samuel Coldien and William Davis. They had been in the yards south of the Big Four freight depot and were driving out onto High Street. They claim they did not hear any warning, and owing to the location did not see the car until it was upon them.

The motor car was southbound and struck the wagon near the horses, breaking the wagon pole and the foot board. The horses were struck, one being knocked to one side with a few bruises as a result, and the other being knocked down and pushed along. It was so badly bruised up that it will be laid up for some time.

Remarkable to state, the men on the wagon escaped without injury, as did the motor men. The terror of the passengers can better be imagined than described.

The north approach to the trestle is as dangerous as the South approach, and in the opinion of the transfer company, a watchman should be placed there as well as at Naghten street.
